

Thread ID: thread_Ez6pLp13Y4xcieGKjt4CFgGv

Created at: 11 July 2025, 09:23:47

User (09:25:26):

source 7

Assistant (09:25:28):

Source 7 refers to a photograph from the Coal Board showing the backs of a row of old colliery houses from 1920. This source can provide insights into housing conditions for miners during the 1920s.

Let's analyse it using the RICHRAB framework:

Reasons: What might have led to the construction of these colliery houses? How does this reflect the mining industry's needs at the time?

Impact: In what ways do you think the living conditions depicted in the photograph affected the miners and their families? What does this say about their quality of life?

Change: Does this source indicate any changes in housing standards for workers in the 1920s compared to previous decades?

How things worked: What does the photograph suggest about the relationship between mining companies and housing provision for their workers?

Responses: How do you think miners or their communities reacted to their housing conditions? Were there any movements or demands for better living conditions?

Attitudes: What public attitudes towards miners and their living conditions might be reflected in this source? How might these attitudes have changed over the decade?

Beliefs: What deeper values about workers' rights and welfare can be inferred from the existence of such housing?

Which of these areas would you like to explore further?
